Muslim terrorists hacked into the U.S. military's network and stole the records of almost 900 members of the U.S. Army's 3rd Infantry Division while they were in a combat role, according to a report from military officials released today. The attack on the division's computers forced the deployment and relocation of the unit, which was stationed at Fort Stewart, Ga., a spokesman for the Army National Guard said. The computer attack was traced back to computers in Kabul and was traced to the Middle East. The military is still trying to determine if the hackers were Iranians, part of a Pakistan-based group or another group, the spokesman said. The 4th Infantry Division, the division's primary component, will replace 3rd Infantry Division in Iraq and Afghanistan. "The issue is that it goes to critical systems," Army Major General Peter Chiarelli told reporters at a Pentagon briefing today. "As a result, we had to take some very aggressive action...to protect networks and we did so." The report makes clear that the incident was not a sophisticated one. A lone employee from the 1st Armored Division, carrying out a "social engineering" attack, was able to retrieve files, according to military officials. The man was identified in early September and according to a statement by a senior Obama administration official, has been arrested and is in custody. In a statement, the Pentagon said that the "suspect had been employed by the Army for 10 years as an administrative specialist in the U.S. Army 3rd Infantry Division." The report is notable because of the military's transparent effort to avoid any potential backlash from the public over security issues, such as this. Instead, officials emphasized that a series of actions were taken to prevent a repeat of the attack. After the incident, the Army increased security at bases around the world and added new security measures to its network. There is also a new software patch to make sure the networks do not accept or host malicious files. Officials emphasized that hacking into military computer systems was not something new. According to the Department of Defense, previous attacks on Army networks have included the theft of names and personal information of service members, the pilfering of intelligence and the loss of personal property.
