Delicate tracheal mucosa. A case report. Gross examination and histologic studies of the trachea are often performed to evaluate patients for tumor mass. This report describes a rare clinical presentation of a subepithelial mass in the trachea. A 1-year-old girl was referred because of persistent respiratory distress, chronic cough, and a mass in the trachea. The tracheal mucosa appeared intact and was the only abnormal feature. Microscopic examination revealed a subepithelial lymphoid and histiocytic infiltrate within the tracheal submucosa, not involving the mucosa.

Following the diagnosis of tracheal lymphoma, the patient was treated with a 12-week course of chlorambucil. A repeat tracheal biopsy 6 months later showed resolution of the infiltrate. A diagnosis of tracheal lymphoma should be considered as a cause of a mass in the trachea. However, in this case, the only abnormal finding at gross examination was a discrete submucosal mass in the trachea. The biopsy revealed tracheal lymphomatous involvement. - 4 2 0 . 9 2 - - 4 2 1 .
