Back in those distant days, most people saw crime not as a big deal, but more as something that happened to other people, in other neighborhoods, so we didn't pay much attention to it. Until, of course, someone started a serial killer in the neighborhood. (Dan) It was a pretty dark time in Detroit. (Thane) In those days you could park almost anywhere, it was a pretty abandoned place. (Dan) So in the 1960s, a woman named Laura Jones was living in this house, on 6th Street near Hereford, right there, in the center of this picture. (Thane) Her parents had moved to the suburbs, but Laura, she just couldn't say no to the gravitational pull of Detroit, so she came home. She'd been working at a bakery as a waitress, but she was planning on starting a beauty school when she saved up enough money. So one evening, she and her friend Diana were just walking down the street, and they saw something that would change their lives forever. (Diana) We heard moaning. (Thane) They were very close by the side of the road, they'd heard strange noises before, but they didn't really pay much attention to them, so they walked over to see what was going on. Diana says, "We pulled up along side of a car, and saw this, this man, he had his head in the car. And, then he looked up at us, and then we saw that his mouth was bleeding. So we started running towards him, and we saw that he was jumping out of the car as we went by." (Dan) And what happened next was horrifying. The man got out of the car, and Diana described him as a thin, sickly-looking man. (Diana) And then it was like he turned and saw us, and like he had this stare that was evil." (Thane) There was something, though, about this woman. She had something special. So as he got back into the car, she called out to him. (Laura) "No more, no more." She knew what he was doing, and she was willing to stand her ground.
