There is an increasing demand for information on the basic sperm functions that are necessary for successful fertilization. The purpose of this work was to establish the physiological relevance of basic parameters of human sperm function by comparing the male phenotype of semen samples collected by masturbation, in vivo and in vitro. The results show that the differences in basic parameters between the three groups are less pronounced than expected from their statistical range. It was concluded that a semen sample satisfying all the basic sperm function parameters obtained by the techniques described in this paper is usually ejaculated. Post navigation The university campus and the City of Los Angeles are experiencing a real fiscal crisis and in trying to balance the budget and increase efficiency, one of their priorities is downsizing and eliminating some programs. SACS, the local chapter of the American Association of University Professors, is opposing these cuts and stands ready to take action to protect faculty and students. The union will be hosting a rally tomorrow, March 19, at 11 am in UCLA's Royce Hall to express concerns and will be posting more information regarding this campaign in the

Q: how to write a shell script that finds files with a specific string in the file name I would like to write a shell script that takes a directory and finds all the files that have a specific string in the name. For example, I would like to find all the files that have .1 in their name and this needs to be done recursively. A: If I understand your question correctly, you want to find all the .1 files in a directory. If that's the case, the following would do the trick: find. -type f -name '.1' Note: you can change the last bit to just -name to make it case insensitive. And, if you want to replace the wildcard in the name with a variable, use this: find. -type f -name $(echo *.1 | sed -e's/\\/'')
