Â·Post navigation Solid Design for Success We love the items that we use on a daily basis. It's the products you don't see every day, like your daily shampoo or your wedding ring, that makes you feel special and like you belong. We think about accessories as a reflection of one's personal style. On a daily basis we are exposed to all kinds of items: From the items we own to the things we interact with. It can range from a scarf, to a car, to a mobile phone, to coffee, to your pillows, etc. When we add a new look to one of our items, we want it to give us more than just a new look. We want it to reflect our personality.

About The Author My name is Joko, I'm an interior designer and image consultant. I work as the creative director at "Ink It Up". I have been working in the design field for over 10 years. Besides that, I work as an event planner, stylist and creative consultant. I enjoy all aspects of design but my true passion is interior design. I'm delighted to be living in Malaysia and working for a design-oriented company.

Installer Patch Â· Battlezone 1 (1.5.2.20) Full Game Installer Patch. The present invention relates to a coherent laser radar as described in the preambles of independent claims 1 and 17.

Furthermore the invention relates to a laser beam module for a coherent laser radar as described in the preambles of
independent claims 18 and 19.

Frequency-modulated continuous-wave (FMCW) radars are used for measuring distances, surface speeds and detection of range-distributed objects (terrain inhomogeneities). They operate with light rather than radar waves. The advantages are precise distance measurement, simple construction and short response time. These are also the disadvantages. For example a FMCW radar is not able to detect moving objects in its area. Coherent laser radars are used to measure distances at a high speed. The laser beam is split by a beam splitter into a receiving laser beam and a reference laser beam. The reference laser beam is coherent light, so the object in the receiving laser beam is not disturbed by Doppler shift. This operation principle and the corresponding beam arrangements are described, for example in FI patent publications 5288 (P60-P65) and 79854 (P61-P66). The disadvantage of using coherent laser radars for measuring distances, i.e. long-range measurements, is that there is only an economical way of increasing the beam strength by using larger and more powerful laser transmitters. The maximum distance is limited. The reason for this is that an increasing beam strength decreases the coherency of the laser beam by increasing the incoherent detection cross-sections and also by reducing the beam divergence. The incoherent detection cross-section is defined as the area in which an incoherent object is able to interfere with the received coherent laser beam, and the beam divergence is defined as the angle between the best divergence plane and the direction of the beam propagation. The ratio between the beam divergence and the incoherent detection cross-section determines the proportion of the total laser beam power which is directed to the receiving head.

A low divergence and a high incoherent detection cross-section implies that a large proportion of the laser beam energy is lost in the incoherent detection cross-section. The ratio between the divergence angle and the incoherent detection cross-section is proportional to the ratio between the maximum distance and the accuracy. For example, with a divergence
