The airfield's primary mission is as a forward operating location (FOL) for the Air Combat Command. It is a Class D airfield capable of accommodating military aircraft of the U.S. Army. It is named for Major David R. Norman, a World War II Army fighter pilot of the 78th Fighter Squadron, who was killed in the Battle of the Bulge on January 23, 1945. History World War II Norman Army Airfield was originally constructed in 1942 as Hazelrigg Field, a sub-base of Will Rogers Field in Oklahoma City, in response to American entry into World War II. At the time, it was designated as an Army Air Corps training field for carrier-based squadrons. The first Army Air Force units at Hazelrigg were the 81st Bombardment Squadron (Light) and 65th Bombardment Squadron. The Army Air Forces (AAF) took over the facility on April 1, 1942 and renamed it Hazelrigg Field. Strategic Air Command In 1952, the Strategic Air Command (SAC) activated the 1560th Strategic Wing at Hazelrigg and it provided forward area command and control (FAC&C) for the first time in the history of the United States Air Force. The 1560th remained at Hazelrigg until 1963 when it moved to Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, leaving the 1003d Air Base Wing to provide manpower and materiel support at Hazelrigg until that time. It is the only USAF unit to retain a military airfield designation when it moved to a reserve installation. After leaving Norman the 1560th Strategic Wing was not renumbered. It was replaced at Hazelrigg by the 2200th Combat Support Group which assumed its mission, personnel, and equipment. Norman AFB The 2200th Strategic Wing was deactivated in 1976 and its mission, personnel and equipment transferred to Eglin Air Force Base. The base was renamed as Norman Air Force Base and was assigned to the United States Air Force Reserve. On October 1, 1992, the Air Force realigned their numbered Air Force bases. For a
