. This software is very secure and compatible with most brand of ECM firmware..1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of computer network monitoring, management, control and configuration. 2. Background Art Computer network control systems have been used in many different applications. Such systems control the flow of data through a computer network. Such data, for example, can be generated by a monitoring application in the network. The monitoring application can generate data to be transferred to a server computer. The server computer can process the data to form reports or control the flow of data according to policies established by an administrator. The monitoring application may transfer the data to the network in several different ways. One type of data transfer is a constant volume data flow. Such a data flow is set up by the administrator. The data transfers are set up and controlled by the administrator to respond to the transfer requirements of the monitoring application. This requires the administrator to be intimately familiar with the monitoring application, which makes the system less flexible. Another type of data transfer is a variable volume data flow. Such a data flow is set up by the administrator when the monitoring application generates the volume of data that will be transferred. Such a variable volume data flow, however, requires the administrator to guess how much data the monitoring application will generate. This limits the administrator's flexibility. If the monitoring application generates less data than anticipated, then the transfer of data will have to be stopped or slowed down. If the monitoring application generates more data than anticipated, then the transfer of data may have to be stopped or slowed down. One mechanism by which data is transferred is a "pull" mechanism. According to a pull mechanism, the transfer of data is triggered by an application on the network generating the data. This allows the transfer of data in response to the requirements of the application, without requiring any knowledge on the part of the administrator of the monitoring application. In many cases, the network may have a plurality of data transfer mechanisms. For example, in addition to a pull mechanism, the transfer of data through the network can also be triggered by an application, or by an administrator, or by a management application, or by an agent or daemon application or by a "ping" mechanism. If multiple transfer mechanisms are used, it is important that there be a way to programmatically enable or disable a transfer mechanism, independent of the other transfer mechanisms. The transfer of data is typically triggered by the monitoring application when the transfer is needed.
