Our emotions are likely just as different from those of our mother-in-law. It would seem that you couldn't be more different. Yet the two of you seem to connect, especially when you are both being truthful. You are choosing to be present with each other, even though there is distance between you. I don't get it. How do you tolerate each other when your values and objectives are so different?

Partners and Lovers First, there's mutual respect and thanksgiving for the things they do for each other -- we, for example, get a laugh every day out of a forum he posts on. Things they do to each other that would be construed as unloving or emotionally withdrawn behavior here are those things that they could understand and talk with one another about. They've worked on this together, they've talked about the issues, and they've had a lot of time together. They've asked me to keep sharing with them the parts of each other that are different, and at times I am even stunned. Yet, it also seems obvious that there are many times they have agreed to spend time with one another, and they haven't spoken for weeks or months on end, and their social-emotional skills have just been fine. The fact that they have a common language of "truth" and "being real" allows them to share their experiences and feelings with each other.

The spiritual work they do together is very present. They share their experiences with God, they discuss with each other what they are thinking, what their feelings are -- they talk about what's going on in their personal and spiritual development. Where to begin? Darkseed, in the Lands Between, contains a level cap of 30. The setting has elements from both Temerantia and a variety of other place settings. That said, there is no official stat block or lore for the situation of the Tarnished, the race of elves and dwarves that live between realms. The setting we have now is a quickfire, a creation on top of the base system. If you dig it, look for it?

Q: Caching and performance I'm looking to obtain a very good and fast cache system. At the moment I use a cache layer (EHCACHE) which runs on a different machine/server. My model of this cache is a traditional on-disk cache. I want to try Sql Server but it is probably too expensive. I have planned to use memcached but I have read that it is important that your data is small to be best served by the cache. Is this a problem with my model? I will be reading large files to be cached. What about other methods? This is what I have done so far: Store only one file (or group of files) at a time. Thus only one record is deleted. I will be using the filemtime to see if it was modified so I can erase. Read only once a time and write once a time. This is the best way to go for the file cache. That way you don't have to worry about reusing a piece of data (but I have read it's best to do so to maximize the performance). Is this the right approach or should I try something different? A: I am assuming that you are using Memcached to store your data. Memcached is a good cache-oriented
