why this is an interesting concept for compositing, albeit with numerous disadvantages compared to regular Sub-Pixel Rendering. ScanLine Sub-Pixel Rendering on several planes / renderings This animation shows how to render infinite angles, although realistically you should only do a render for a small, maybe 10 degrees worth of the whole sphere. You will see, that the actual rendering is not quite smooth, but this is impossible to achieve with this technique. There is also a frame rate drop, as you can actually cause the rendering to only compute the lines that are visible, which of course also leads to less work to be done. The reasons for most of this is that most virtual cameras, and real-world conditions do not actually have these projection planes perfectly lined up, which results in de-focusing and aliasing effects, which you will see later.

The Basics The idea here is that we will just render into a depth buffer, nothing more than that. The idea here is that because of the SLSR technique, we have a look-up-table with every possible depth. So if I calculate the depth for each "point" as it advances, I find which depth I get, and then jump into my lookup-table. Let's dive in: Imagine that I want to render infinite points. Let's say I start at, and just render points until I compute an infinite render, which for example would be at. By doing so I render the points for which, and an infinite number of points for which. Now imagine I divide the world into slices. So each level is a slice, which is a little bit further than the previous level. I can split my world into levels, and then render each level on it's own, by rendering each slice. The render for level 3 of 3 of our example. First

BRUSSELS: Microsoft Group has accused its Dutch rival Novell of infringing several of its copyrights in its .Net software stack, and is seeking around 7 million euros in damages (nearly $9 million). Microsoft, acting on behalf of a group of 30 companies, says that between November 2006 and August 2007 Novell (Novell), without authorization or compensation, purchased licenses for the .Net technology stack the software companies developed. In addition, the technology firm says it has licensed the patents covering the technology to Novell, but that without receiving any compensation, Novell responded by threatening to use the intellectual property for its own benefit, and making other unauthorized uses. Those include violations of its own licence and patent use, and by failing to provide informed consent when purchasing the licences, Microsoft claims. Microsoft, based in the US, is the largest company to sue another for patent and copyright infringement. In its so-called complaint, Microsoft accuses Novell of:

- using .Net technology without permission or compensation;
- using patents without permission or compensation;
- using trademarks of the technology, including the word “.Net”;
- failing to provide adequate advice prior to licensing;
- failing to properly inform licences covered by certain contractual obligations;
- using, misusing or permitting the use of .Net trademarks and logos, without the permission of Microsoft.
