Triggering a function on body load for cross-browser compatibility I have a show/hide function that runs on window load. However, the function is written to run only for Firefox, and I'm guessing it works for Firefox because it's written for the Firefox DOM events that fire on body load. I am trying to get it to work for Chrome as well, and I can't figure out how to get the chrome specific events to fire on window load. Is there a way to get chrome specific events to fire on window load? Or another way to get the same behavior across all browsers?

A: The following code should work for Chrome and FF, as well as IE, Opera, Safari, and most mobile browsers: `window.onload = function() { // do something... };` The "something" here will only be executed once the page has loaded and there is sufficient time to run through all the event handlers.

Q: Is it possible to use the lightnet network on my card? I am trying to build a supersampled network similar to the one that comes with OpenCV. I have seen some of these networks built using `cvNet::LightNet` and it seems as if I can use this network on my card (since the file that can be downloaded from the site is a built binary). However, I get an error when I try to build `0cc13bf012`
