For example, a plugin would have a list of actions and associated values, which are stored in a database, then you could use them like this:

Plugin.plugin_name.action1(whatever) Plugin.plugin_name.action2(whatever)

I was thinking of doing this by setting up some action names in a plugin and then creating a PluginNameController which would simply have an index method which takes a parametrized action/value pair and then proceed to use that in the plugin. The plugin will then take this information and then call another model to get the action and value, put that back in the plugin, and call a method on that model that iterates over all actions and returns the values for those actions. Then, when you call the action in the plugin, it would look something like: @action = Plugin.plugin_name.get_action_for(:name => 'action1') @value = @action.get_value(:value) I think there might be a better way to do this, but this is what I came up with. Is this overkill? I'd like the actions to be independent of the plugin itself and have them listable in the PluginNameController. A: What about using a scope on the plugin model. That would allow you to do stuff like this, Plugin.plugin_name(action: 'whatever') in your controller and that return an array of the action values. I use this a lot with actions that need config values to filter on. FOOD BEASTS THINKING "INTOGLOVE It's a heady time for those in the start-up business. With the delightful
