Towards a Closer Union (Common Textbook Program) This is page 1 of a PDF file of the Common Textbook Program description. Page 1 is about the scope and reach of the program. There is a total of four pages, double spaced. Scop and Reach: There are four goals (with five components) the Common Textbook Program is intended to achieve: Students would have access to a core set of textbooks at university. Smaller institutions would have access to a core set of textbooks at university. Larger institutions would be able to afford and have access to their own teaching materials. Smaller secondary schools and primary schools would have access to a core set of textbooks. The Common Textbook Program also aims to develop a standard text and to incentivise textbook publishers to support this standard text. The criteria used to identify required textbooks for the academic cycle 2012-2018 are: They must be consistent with the learning goals of Australia's Curriculum for Languages. They must be accessible to students with a wide range of needs. They must be available to students and small institutions at a reasonable cost. They should be supported by authors and publishers who are incentivised to support the use of their products. Early advice on the identification of required textbooks for the Academic Cycle 2010/11-2015/16 (Expected delivery of first volume textbooks for 2010/11) Report to the Minister for Education and Training in relation to the Academic Cycle 2010/11 to 2015/16 (Expected delivery of first volume textbooks for 2010/11) Report to the Minister for Education and Training in relation to the Academic Cycle 2016/17 to 2018/19 (Expected delivery of first volume textbooks for 2016/17) The Common Textbook Program is currently being designed to achieve the following priorities: Have a core set of textbooks, published by one or more large publishing houses, as one of the key components of the integration program. Have a coordinated set of high quality, standard texts, supported by the large publishers, as another component of the integration program. Each institution would have the flexibility and opportunity to select individual or combination of textbooks as appropriate for their curriculum. The last two components would become available only after 2017/18. The Common Textbook Program is expected to be funded by the Department as follows: Small institutions: $

As the average age of the Norwegian population has increased over the past several decades, concerns about the sustainability of our economy and society have gained increasing attention. This research examines the recycling knowledge and behaviors of Norwegian university students, and whether their understanding of waste management and personal recycling behaviors is in line with the philosophy of recycling. The research sample comprised 3086 students (17-21 years) from 15 universities in five regions in Norway. It is found that many students hold recycling-related misconceptions. Fewer respondents were aware of the impact of waste management practices on the environment and human health, and they expressed the opinion that the environment is not sufficiently protected from a health and safety perspective. Furthermore, a large majority of the respondents identified shopping bags and cigarettes as waste. Only 23% of the respondents recognized that food waste was another form of waste. Students tended to adopt a rational-choice perspective toward waste management, suggesting that they would proactively choose alternatives to waste disposal. In contrast, most of the respondents were aware of the simple, short, and low-cost methods for waste reduction. Significant negative correlations were found between respondents' understanding of waste and their adoption of simple, short, and low-cost methods for waste reduction. Students' pro-recycling attitudes were also negatively related to their attitudes toward waste disposal methods, namely recycling, biodegradation, and incineration, and the mere belief in environmental protection.In 2014, he became the first Democratic mayor of South Bend, Indiana, in two decades, and then two years later announced he would not run for re-election.
