Contents: Use Photoshop's Basic Features I find that the most productive and effective way to start a new project is by using basic features and functions that Photoshop provides. While Adobe has broken out this program into distinct programs for painting, photography, web design, and video editing, in reality, all these programs function much the same. Even if I'm not creating a photo, I will often use the layer-based editing capabilities that Photoshop provides to organize my work. When opening a new document, Photoshop asks you what you would like to name the file. In the exercise, I use a new file titled "New File." The New Document Each of Photoshop's programs has a similar way of opening a new document, and it is where you can define the functions of Photoshop you want to use. In this new file, I want to organize my work by selecting the Layers group from the Window menu on the top of the workspace. With the Layers group selected, a box with the word "Layers" on it will appear. Next, I'll click the box to add a new layer to the current active layer. Now I'll drag the layer from the Layers palette to the current image, and Photoshop adds a new layer to the Layers panel. Photoshop automatically creates a blank layer called Background. Since I named the new file "New File," I know that I'll also want to make a New Layer for my new project, so I will name it "Foreground." Right away, I can see the new layer sitting in the Layers panel as a green box. I drag the layer into the current image and drop it into the next position, making the two layers visible. By clicking the Layer Composition icon on the Layers panel, I can get a visual overview of what Photoshop is working on. As you can see, Photoshop created two layers, made one layer visible, and overlaid the second layer over the first layer. When you click the eye icon at the top of the Layers panel, the layers that are currently on screen will be highlighted. The Layers Panel Often, I'll find that I need to create multiple layers in Photoshop, either multiple layers of the same image or multiple layers of different images. By using the Layer Composition icon in the Layer panel, I can visually see the composite image I am working on.

Vegetable soup For this soup, you'll first need to get your noodles cook. I've used rice noodles for this, but any cooked vegetable would work well in this soup. Once the noodles are cooked, just add the vegetables, broth, and basil to the mix. Ingredients 1 bunch of basil, leaves only, chopped 1/4 cup of balsamic vinegar 1 cup of vegetable broth 1/2 pound of extra-firm tofu, cut into small cubes (discard the extra liquid in the bottom of the tofu) 1/2 cup of white rice noodles 1/2 green bell pepper, chopped 1/2 cucumber, chopped 1/2 red bell pepper, chopped 1 carrot, chopped Optional: Sautee the bell peppers in a little olive oil before adding to the soup. Directions Combine everything in a blender or food processor. Blend until smooth.Q: How to verify the client that provides the access token has permissions for the API? I'm new to working with API and I'm looking into ways that I can verify the client to ensure that it has permissions in a way that I can and a third party cannot spoof the request. Right now I'm thinking of this approach (I'm using JWT's and Firebase) The third party sends the access token to my API My API encrypts the token using the public and private keys then redirects to the third party to verify the signature. Is this approach a good one? I'm not confident that the third party would not have the private key and could replay the request. If I use a refresh token instead of the access token to issue the API key, is the refresh token any different than the access token in terms of security? A: The access_token doesn't matter for your scenario, its the refresh_token that matters. Refresh token is a long lived token, that can be used for: Future requests to your API. Future login requests to you. Future authenticated requests to your API Third party requests to your API The refresh token is usually a must in production. You cannot revoke it. You may consider the option that the refresh token is sent to your API with the access token, this would allow you to check that the refresh
