the art of oil production, oil wells are formed by drilling boreholes into a subterranean oil-bearing formation. Some form of well completion machinery is often used to restore fluid communication to the oil formation after drilling of the borehole. The term well completion as used herein includes all other forms of well completion such as, but not limited to, remedial work associated with lost circulation, damage removal, formation isolation, sand control, gravel packing, and treatment of low permeability zones. The term completion as used herein also includes completion operations associated with secondary recovery such as, but not limited to, water injection, gas injection, and solvent injection. Following the drilling of a borehole to a desired depth, a section of well casing is lowered into the borehole on a well casing hanger and landed in the borehole. Typically, the casing hanger lands in a landing shoe in the well casing. When the casing hanger lands, its internal slips engage the casing hanger's internal diameter. The size of the casing hanger's internal slips is selected such that when the casing hanger is landed the casing hanger can be safely and securely engaged in the landing shoe. After the casing hanger lands, the well is completed by installing a completion string into the well. The completion string usually comprises drill pipe, casing and a primary cementing assembly. The primary cementing assembly is used to fill the annulus formed between the outside of the casing and the borehole. The primary cementing operation can be
