Operation-The-Bike Let's face it: strolling around the city is a well-established way to travel, but it's also a pretty darned inefficient way to travel. The average adult shouldn't be expected to carry multiple 1- and 2-pound bags of groceries from the car to his or her apartment. I love my bike and the freedom it gives me to "go places" and "do things", but it's hard to pedal through traffic (or at least it used to be), and though there are a few things I can (and do) carry in the back of my bike (like a backpack full of laundry, or even a small cooler), I don't usually have space for anything other than my helmet. Even though biking is fun, it doesn't really pay when it comes to the financial, grocery, and environmental reasons. First week of CyleLit and I went to Bikes and Beans, a co-working space in the Mission District that claims to "give people a ride to work," and I made good on that promise! I was just about finished putting away my gear when I found out we were starting a bike-share program, which would mean I could ride anywhere in the city for a $30 monthly membership fee. Within a few minutes, I was online (yay!) and signed up for their service. After I had gotten all that figured out, I decided to go out on a bike ride one morning and see what it was like to cycle around the city without having a car. I was nervous that I would be late for work, but my membership card is handy, and the whole experience (I think) went pretty smoothly. The docking station is located at: 3rd and Church, just three blocks from my office. Don't be afraid of riding in the Mission. It's not so at all like the 8 Mile Neighborhood of Gary or the Rust Belt cities of Cleveland or Detroit. Sure, it's in the middle of San Francisco, but there aren't any political and economic battles being waged here, so the city tends to maintain its charm (though I can't speak for the increased number of homeless people). I returned home for lunch and discovered a new "bike couriered" restaurant. It's more of an airplane hangar than a
