The effect of ketamine on the function of polymorphonuclear leukocytes (PMNs) in the human blood has been investigated. Ketamine had no effect on the ability of the PMNs to absorb or kill ingested bacteria, but significantly reduced their capacity to migrate from the micro-environment of the capillary to the chemotactic stimuli. Ketamine at 2.5 micrograms/ml did not inhibit either superoxide generation, nor elastase release, whereas at 5 micrograms/ml it reduced superoxide generation to approximately 50% of the control value. It is suggested that the reduced migration of PMNs may contribute to the increased clearance of bacteria from the infected tissue and to the reduced risk of post-operative wound infections. into the receiving body through the lumen of the insertion device. 31.
