I've thought about it a bit and it looks like just scanning for a new line character after finding a complete tag doesn't work. Because there are multiple other tags that aren't in the string. A: In general, you can use regular expressions to find "interesting" sentences in large document. For example, all sentences that starts with a capital letter, and all sentences that starts with $ ^[A-Z] In your case, you could use regular expressions in combination with a parser that starts after a new line: def process_sentence(string): # split on newline start, end = string.split(' ') # loop through words for word in start.split(): # if it is a valid identifier, save it if word.lower() in valid_identifiers: # remove the first character, and save the rest new_word = word[1:] # save it if next(start_tags) or end: # look for the newline character new_line = new_word.find(' ') # replace the newline character with the word new_word = new_word.replace(' ', word[new_line+1:]) # repeat for the rest of the words start_words.append(new_word) # save the complete new word start_words.append(new_word) #
