in the country, the Associated Press (AP) reported. This comes after a record number of evictions in the country in 2019. The number of homes affected by forced evictions in 2019, according to government figures released in March, was the highest recorded in the last decade. Since then, the government has been making efforts to curb evictions. In April, a bill was passed in Parliament to extend the eviction moratorium to two years. Malawi's justice minister, Martin Kalombil, told the AP in an interview on Monday that the president will use his new authority to issue a decree halting the practice. "It is a legal process, and [government officials] will follow the law when they evict, and they will be doing so in respect of that legal process," he said. More than 38,000 Malawians were living in informal settlements as of August 2019, according to the country's statistics agency. The human rights group Transparency International Malawi estimates that more than 175,000 people have been evicted from their homes since the moratorium began. The government, however, said evictions began under Malawi's previous administration in 2014 and that those forced out were provided
