Alteration of integrin α IIb β 3 expression in human B-lymphoma cell lines by microRNA-335. Previous studies in our laboratory reported that microRNA-335 (miR-335) was significantly up-regulated in T cells, natural killer cells, and B cells from multiple sclerosis patients and is involved in the development of autoimmunity. However, the roles of miR-335 in regulating tumor cell proliferation and migration, angiogenesis, and metastasis in hematologic malignancies are poorly understood. In this study, we addressed the role of miR-335 in regulating the function of human B cells. We found that overexpression of miR-335 reduced the survival and growth of human B-lymphoma cells, which was accompanied by reduced integrin α IIb β 3 expression. Moreover, the reduction of integrin α IIb β 3 expression was shown to be specific, as overexpression of miR-335 did not affect the expression levels of other integrin subunits. Importantly, reduced integrin α IIb β 3 expression was not associated with changes in cell cycle distribution or apoptosis. Furthermore, reduced α IIb β 3 expression significantly inhibited B cell migration and adhesion, suggesting that miR-335 may play a role in the migration and invasion of tumor cells. Consistent with this finding, miR-335 overexpression also promoted the migration and invasion of tumor cells. These results indicate that miR-335 could be a potential therapeutic target to prevent the migration and invasion of tumor cells. Urethral obstruction caused by juvenile xanthogranuloma (JXG) is a very rare benign clinical complication in children. This complication is often misdiagnosed as neoplasm and leads to high misdiagnosis rate and delayed referral in childhood. We report a case of 6-year-old boy with JXG in the bladder and urethra and the review of the literature.In a post-truth, no-holds-barred age, people can simply choose not to believe what they are told and/or see in media. They can even seek evidence to support their biases and absolve themselves of the requirement to consider other views. A new spate of challenge petitions to the High Court allows people to circumvent the public petitioning system to get their spurious arguments in front of the High Court. They can then, again, refuse to consider the evidence brought to the court by others and use this as a basis to strike down the law they find so objectionable. Campaigners may believe that a petition is the only legitimate way to bring a case, and all the evidence must be brought forward for it to be valid. The premise of petitioning is to secure the support of the public for the case put forward. However, the High Court itself has found that, where there are more than three other similar cases pending, petitioning is not the best way to assert a case, even if it is more effective than a judicial review. Therefore, it is easy to see that simply launching a petition in the High Court at the start of a counter-terrorism investigation will make it easier for the state to shut down debate on the subject entirely.
