IVR systems are widely used in businesses, such as banks, insurance companies, and telephone operators because they provide an efficient means to obtain information and to conduct transactions. For example, a user can call the IVR system of a bank using a telephone and speak with a customer service representative. The user may hear a menu of functions that are available to the user, for example, the option of transferring money from one account to another. The customer service representative may help the user to conduct the transactions. IVR systems can be used in various ways. For example, users can make phone calls from the IVR system to another location, such as the location of the IVR system itself. When the user accesses the IVR system from another location, the user is directed to a destination which is usually an appropriate person to handle the request. In some case, a user may want to speak with another person using the IVR system, rather than using the system to call other locations, such as another IVR system, or a person.
