The inclusion of sodium diethylamine accelerates the rate of the polymerization of the ethylene-glycol.[The success of the "front-up" method of splinting traumatized fingers in the emergency surgery department]. The "front-up" method is based on a simple principle: immobilizing the joint as well as possible. It produces an optimal stability of the joint and allows immediate active extension (prothesis being unnecessary). This type of immobilization does not produce swelling and it is easily tolerated by the patient. We have applied the "front-up" method in a series of 54 cases of fresh (n = 40), old (n = 11) and aftercare (n = 33) fractures of the fingers. As regards the type of fractures, the results are compared with those obtained with immobilization by the "jack-knife" method. The results are evaluated according to the classical and to the new criteria of Timmerman and Thornbergh in "Injury" (1972). The "front-up" method achieved satisfactory results in 92.8% (in respect of the major criteria). The "front-up" technique 6d1f23a050
