stared I'm not sure I understand what is the novelty? The most important general aim is to ensure immediate communication between network nodes at high reliability (also over time - a node shouldn't have to stay in the same place to maintain a connection, which would be a massive bottleneck). That is already in practice with half-duplex links (at least in the wired world). The second (non-trivial) novelty is (for me personally) a bit unclear. It is about having internal packets (with information to be communicated reliably on-network) sent "in an unsupervised way". In a way it is similar to multi-prover systems - the server is a semi-public/anonymous component to ensure that the system stays coherent. ~~~ kev009 It uses established, proven cryptographic systems including hash chains and Merkle Trees to ensure high reliability (and eliminates networking buffers and packet dropouts) but doesn't require messaging (like iota's DHT does). Like bitcoin has built-in hashchains, you can also establish a hashchain of your own in the manner described. The author specifically references potential application of their work to DNS/TCP over UDP, but there are quite a few other places it could be used that are commonly assumed but not universally true: distributed storage/index and networked services like Akasha/chrony, etc. ----- kdtsh Basically ArXiv is a giant virtual machine.
