According to a new report from the Open Society Foundations, a group of legal experts, physicians, and lawyers, who have studied and tracked drug policy over the past fifty years, the US has now become the most dangerous country in the world for drugs. And, those who advocate drug policy reform expect the situation will only get worse, as President Trump's Department of Justice continues its crusade against people living with pain disorders. According to the report, this is not the result of all the progress made in the last decades. While drug policy around the world has become more rational, scientific, and cost-effective, the US has instead become more dangerous, even more complicated, disproportionately violent, and rife with corruption. "The War on Drugs began in the 1970s as an ideology and became a government program in 1980," explains the report. From the early days of Nixon's War on Drugs, through the failure of the War on Drugs to drive the rise of drugs, heroin and other stimulants like methamphetamine and fentanyl, the government has created and backed many of the most dangerous and costly drug policies in US history. "The more we learn about what happened in Mexico, Colombia, El Salvador, and Honduras, the more clear it is that there can be no excuse for the unbelievable costs and missteps of the War on Drugs. What you're seeing now is the criminalization of addiction," says Dr. Donald Black, a professor of community medicine at the University of Colorado. His 2014 book Poison Politics: How Criminalizing Addiction Benefits Politicians, Pushers, and the Corporation, explains how public policy has served advertisers and pharmaceutical companies, rather than people.
