Diosgenin has attracted much attention due to its therapeutic potential. It is a promising agent in cancer therapy because of its antitumor effects on various cancers, especially cervical carcinoma, in animal models. However, the therapeutic effect of diosgenin and its derivatives on human cancers is not well characterized. Therefore, the biological activity of diosgenin was studied in human tumor cell lines. Human colon adenocarcinoma cells (HT-29 and HCT-116) and human cervical carcinoma cells (HeLa) were used in these studies. Cells were treated with various concentrations of diosgenin, and changes in cell viability were detected by a trypan blue dye exclusion assay. The cisplatin-resistant cells were also investigated. Diosgenin and other cucurbitane triterpenoid glycosides (Cusop) from cucurbitaceae were prepared and characterized by NMR spectroscopy. Cucurbitacin isomers, including cis- and trans-isomers of C-24 and C-25 carbons, were also prepared by microbial biotransformation of Cusop. In the dose-dependent bioassay, Cusop showed stronger cytotoxic effects on human tumor cell lines compared with that of diosgenin. Furthermore, the combination of diosgenin and Cusop (1:1

tools for both alcohol-related and other health problems. A primary focus will be on applied health technologies that improve the health care outcomes for hospitalized patients. However, they will be supplemented with studies that address the related health care, economic and service needs of the community. Information and resources to support health-related activities of the hospital will be developed. Major problems will be targeted including: (1) the need to extend the hospital services to the rural community; (2) methods to improve the quality of care and health status of hospitalized patients, (3) the need for more appropriate identification of patients who would most benefit from more intensive involvement of health professionals and services. An overview of the hospital's health-related functions will be provided with emphasis on the care of the alcoholic. The necessary tools to address these problems will be developed using the conceptual framework of patient centered care. Two series of studies are proposed. The first will entail a survey of nurses, nurses' aides and other staff nurses to determine their attitudes and experiences with providing patient-centered care to alcoholic patients. The role of time, limited resources and staff training will be examined. Staff and patient opinions of what makes a patient-centered environment will also be studied. A set of patient-care guidelines will be developed based on the opinions of the hospital staff and patients and their generalizability will be evaluated. Two randomized studies will evaluate the impact of adding on a checklist of patient-centered indicators to the existing hospital chart on the success of discharge and compliance with discharge information. The second study will evaluate the impact of
