To assess the mental health of men with urinary incontinence (UI), by comparing the mental health of men with UI to that of a control group. A cross-sectional study. The 44 men diagnosed with UI were recruited from a private urology clinic and regional urinary conditions support group. Men, who self-reported or were diagnosed with UI, without a history of major chronic illness, were invited to participate. Participants completed questionnaires to assess their mental health, including the SF-36 health survey and the Hospital Anxiety and Depression Scale (HADS). Statistical analysis was performed to assess differences between the UI and the control groups on the SF-36 and HADS measures. Further analysis was performed to assess the influence of UI-associated quality of life (QoL) on mental health. No differences were identified between the UI and control groups on the SF-36 and HADS scales. Further, no association was found between the QoL and mental health measures. This study failed to identify any significant differences in the mental health of men with UI compared to a group of community-based men.

Further, no association was found between the QoL of men with UI and their mental health. These findings suggest that the impact of UI on the mental health of men is limited.Epic Condition Scale In the spirit of having new things, I've been on a scale quest. I had three scales from friends, none of which worked. Two were wrong (too high/low) and the third one didn't even work. I ended up buying a cheap digital scale from Staples that was working fine and I weigh myself that way.

It's pretty accurate. So, I figured I'd make one for myself. I knew I wanted it to be stainless steel, stainless being the most durable material and also a good weight. I found a company, J&P Cycles, who sells custom-built scales with stainless steel and wheels, and I bought a scale that they were selling off of their website. It's in great shape and the stainless steel c6a93da74d
