Consciousness: 'I Smell
Like Death' By Alex
Gleason When I close
my eyes I see the blood, the pus, the broken pieces of teeth and bone, the stink and the taste of death. There are traces of my hair and skin, but not much.
The odors and the heat

are still here, the smells of my life. I'm lying in the slaughterhouse.
They are lying in pieces on the floor. The old mother hen, weak and sick, lies beside me. The birdie prances over me, treading on my face, until she is satisfied of my death, I can't move.
She flutters down to the blood and the bones.
She is hungry. A crow flaps in the dark. The sound of its wings beats in my ears. I start laughing. It is coming from within me. The crow caws and caws; it is becoming invisible.

My white sides, my white feathers are disappearing and my father lies there - his blood and bones in the mud, his guns stolen.
My mother lies on top of
him. I know she is dead.
The dog ignores me. He keeps on trying to get at the dead chicken. At night a rooster crows and crows, and it is me crowing at him. I cackle at the starlight.

Someone puts a gun to my head and the rooster crows again. I'm lying on the floor of the slaughterhouse, my father is still lying there.
The dog and the mother hen are still there, and the chicken is still dead.

I'm laughing, crowing,
and dying.// Copyright
