I hope this information will be useful to a significant portion of consultants and engineers looking to find out more about how these interviews work, and the skills required to be a successful one. As well as answering many of the questions I get from potential candidates, I also get a lot of guestions from people such as managers and hiring leads. One such question came up recently and here is my response. As we see from the post above, the role of the consultant is to provide their employers and clients with new and innovative solutions in the context of their unique set of issues. So this brings me to the second reason why consultants are different from engineers: consultants are domain experts. This means that consultants can be more efficient and more innovative than engineers since they are the experts on their specific domains. This is the reason why most solutions proposed by consultants have a much higher impact on their organizations than proposals done by engineers. The consulting firm needs to be able to find the right consultant for the job. I am just one example among many consultants (and I am sure there are very many such examples). But I can't complain! I love my job and the work I do. And you probably can't imagine how much more rewarding it is to see how many new and novel ways people look at and tackle old problems after working through my workshops. This is what keeps me motivated and happy. This is a great question and while the short-term can be a very valuable journey, it can also be a very dangerous one. In my opinion, for candidates who are looking to change their career directions to consulting and MBB, its imperative to focus on learning the skills and tools required for the interview and the job you hope to get. While this may take a couple of years of your time, the investment will certainly pay off!
