screencasting allows instructors to provide students with in-depth feedback and/or evaluation. with response papers and short written assignments, feedback allows the teacher to zoom in and highlight portions for discussion while scrolling through the document. with visually-oriented work (e.g., art work, web sites, and powerpoint presentations), using the mouse to point at key elements, instructors can talk about the impact of the students choices. we suggest that instructors be mindful of time and create multiple videos if there is a need for extensive feedback. conceivably, students can view each of the videos at different times, even on different days. it is debatable how long web-based videos should be (agarwal 2011, scott 2009, skyworksmarketing 2010), but the need for concision and clarity remains vital for both the student and the instructor. we also recommend instructors inform students if only certain types of issues will be discussed in a particular feedback session. logistically, screencasting has its challenges, such as those we encounteredadditional time at the computer and a quiet place to record the videosbut we both discovered ways to mitigate those challenges. for example, one author found that this medium relegates the instructor to a quiet space and the other experienced limited storage capacity on her institutions server. the first author discovered that a noise-cancelling headset allowed her to be mobile while using this feedback method. and the second author had to create alternative means of delivery and archiving by giving students the option of receiving video files via email, downloading and deleting files from the dropbox, or accessing videos via screencast.com, which is not considered private by her institution.
