Rotary printing presses are known in which the printing cylinder is replaceably mounted in a frame and the frame is carried by a main drive or frame drive and a sub-drive or frame drive. The frame has a longitudinal axis of rotation and the frame drive may be of various types; for example, it may have a hydraulic motor mounted on the frame for driving the frame in both rotational directions. A rotary printing press having such a frame arrangement, and in which the frame includes an endless drive chain is described in U.S. Pat. No. 3,760,699. The printing cylinders of a rotary printing press are usually provided with a machine element or element, e.g., a relief cylinder, etc., for producing impression of a pattern. Such a machine element or element may be replaceable in the case of damage or wearing of the same. In order to facilitate replacement of the machine element or element, the machine element or element has been mounted for sliding movement on its carrier element or frame. Thus, a sliding connection can be created between the machine element or element and the carrier element or frame, thereby enabling replacement of the element or element. Various solutions of this type have been proposed, and can be characterized by the fact that the machine element or element is supported against a force acting in a direction in which the element or element is moved towards a direction in which the element or element is radially outwardly moved.
