invention relates to thermosetable compositions and more particularly to thermosetable unsaturated polyester compositions which are highly resistant to hydrolytic attack.
One problem that has long been encountered in the plastics industry is the fact that many plastics are subject to attack by water. Accordingly, attempts have been made to impart to plastics resistance to water. For example, it is known to add various types of resins, including copolymers and cothermosetting phenolic resins, to polymers to give them resistance to weathering. Other types of polymeric compounds that have been used to render plastics water-resistant are the polyurethanes and polyepoxides. The thermosetting resins used in the preparation of epoxy resins can suffer from the disadvantage that they typically are quite brittle, which can make such epoxy resins unsuitable for the preparation of flexible articles, such as automotive interior parts. The use of a "hardener" material such as an amine can improve the strength of many epoxy resins, but such a material can be expensive and may require an undesirably long period of time for the curing reaction. Epoxy resins are known to be curable by the action of a combination of a polyol and a polyamine. U.S. Pat. No.
3,879,349 to Starcher et al. discloses polyepoxy resins that can be cured by heating under pressure for several minutes to several hours at 80
